Dear Members of the CUSD Board,

I have followed the progress of the redistricting process and along with some of you agonized about the perceived inequities that will result. I think that there is one thing that has yet to be said about the process that may mitigate some of the concerns.

By breaking the district into five areas, equity will be increased even among those who do not typically participate. This is so because under the current at large system, the group that voted weighs in on the election of 5 trustees. Under the new regime, they will only have a say in one trustee. That will effectively reduce their influence and thereby diminish the disparate impact on those who don't participate in the process.

I can explain further if you're interested.

Sincerely,

Bill Schrier
